- We share our achievements with the community.

Corporate Profile

About Us

Mann Yadanarpon Airlines (MYP) was incorporated as a Myanmar private limited liability company on 23 July 2013, and granted a permit on 27 January 2014 by the Myanmar Investment Commission to operate air transportation services on both domestic and international routes.

Our Network

Our destinations for the current winter season are Yangon, Mandalay, Nyaung-U (Bagan), Heho (Inle Lake), Tachileik, Kengtung, Myitkyina, Lashio, Thandwe (Ngapali), Sittwe, Loikaw, Khamti, Mawlamyine, Dawei, Myeik, Kawthaung and Chiang Mai. All of our destinations are of tourism and/or commercial significance.

We will expand our network to more domestic destinations after acquiring additional aircraft. We plan to commence regional operations after we have consolidated our domestic operations.

Our Fleet

Our current fleet consists of two new ATR 72-600 aircraft which were delivered on 31 January and 1 April 2014 respectively. We plan to acquire additional ATR 72-600 aircraft in the near future in order to expand our network. An Airbus A-320 aircraft will be leased for our future planned regional operations.

Our Flight Crew

Our pilots are all qualified on ATR 72-600 aircraft type. All our pilots' training are carried out at the ATR Training Centers in Toulouse, France and Singapore, with recurrent and type rating simulator training at ATR approved facilities in Bangkok, Thailand.

Our Cabin Crew

Our cabin crew training and administration managers and supervisors hold cabin crew instructor certificates from the ATR Training Center in Toulouse, France. All of our cabin crew have attended the Airline Cabin Crew Training Course approved by the Department of Civil Aviation.

Our Engineering Crew

Our licensed aircraft maintenance engineers have type ratings on ATR 72-600 from the ATR Training Centers in Toulouse, France and Singapore.

Maintenance of our aircraft is carried out by our own Approved Maintenance Organization approved by the Department of Civil Aviation, Myanmar. Base maintenance is outsourced to approved maintenance, repair and overhaul organizations (MROS).

Mann Yadanarpon achieves IOSA Registration

Mann Yadanarpon has become the first domestic airline to achieve certification under the International Air Transport Association's Operational Safety Audit Audit (IOSA) programme.

The IOSA registration reflects Mann Yadanarpon's safety and reliability, and improvement of domestic aviation industry. Since its establishment in 2013, Mann Yadanarpon has maintained a perfect safety record and the IOSA registration offers further peace of mind to passengers.

"At Mann Yadanarpon, safety and service always comes first. IOSA registration is an important step in achieving our ambition of being the airline of choice for customers in Myanmar," said Mann Yadanarpon Chairman U Than Oo.

He also paid tribute to the efforts of the Mann Yadanarpon team in achieving the IOSA certification.

The certification is valid through to August 2018, when Mann Yadanarpon will again be audited for compliance to IOSA standards.

The IOSA programme was introduced in 2003 and is designed to assess the operational management and control systems of an airline and is the benchmark for global safety management in airlines.

The auditing standards have been developed in collaboration with regulatory authorities including the United States' Federal Aviation Administration, Australia's Civil Aviation Safety Authority, Transport Canada and the Joint Aviation Authorities.

The process features a structured audit methodology with standardised checklists, ensuring consistency in implementation. The IOSA continually updates its standards to reflect best practices in the industry.

The audits are conducted by one of six accredited organisations that have met stringent IOSA training and qualification standards.

The benefits of the IOSA programme area clear for passengers, airlines and regulators. The total accident rate for IOSA-accredited carriers between 2011 and 2015 was 3.3 times lower than for non-IOSA operators. Its benefits are recognised even by airlines that are not members of the IATA; as of March 2015, 145 (36 percent) of the 405 airlines on the IOSA registry were non-IATA members.

IOSA registration is, however, a mandatory requirement for all airlines to maintain membership of the IATA, which is the trade association of the world's airlines and represents some 265 carriers accounting for 83 percent of total air traffic.

The association's mission is to represent, lead and serve the airline industry, and the IOSA programme reflects its ambition to drive a safe, secure and profitable air transport industry.

For passengers, IOSA registration indicates that an airline complies with the most stringent aviation safety rules and practices.

That Mann Yadanarpon has undertaken this process is a sign of its desire to set the standard not just in Myanmar but across the Southeast Asian region.

It also reflects its vision to be the airline of choice for customers by maintaining the highest levels of safety, service and efficiency.

The 80,000: MRAUK U'S SHITTAUNG PAGODA

Douglas Long

The full moon of the lunar month of Kason is an important time for Buddhists in Myanmar, as it celebrates the day of the year that Prince Siddhartha was born, attained Buddhahood and passed away, entering mahaparnibbana (eternal bliss). On the full moon day, which this year falls on May 10, pilgrims crowd pagodas across the country at daybreak, chanting religious verses (suttas) and pouring water from silver bowls onto the earth from which sacred bodhi trees grow. Offerings of candles, flowers and fruit are also made to Buddha images, and food is donated to monasteries where Buddhist monks reside.

Kason is a particularly special occasion at Shittaung Pagoda in Mrauk U, Rakhine State, because it marks the culmination of the pagoda's annual week-long festival. Like most annual religious celebrations held throughout Myanmar, the Shittaung Pagoda Festival features traditional song and dance performances, carnival rides and games, as well as a temporary market where vendors sell everything from food and drinks to toys and clothing.

However, the Shittaung festival is also permeated with a uniquely Rakhine atmosphere. Local cultural groups wearing traditional ethnic costumes perform Rakhine dances, beat Rakhine drums, and sing songs about the Buddha in Rakhine language. Evening concerts feature Rakhine pop stars who travel from across Myanmar to perform.

The Shittaung Pagoda Festival is also notable for its physical contests, such as Rakhine wrestling (kyin). Matches take place on a wide, tree-shaded area at the foot of the pagoda, with the large audience arrayed in a circle around the contestants. Kicking and punching are prohibited, and the object is to force the opponent's back to the ground. The final matches occur on the full moon day of Kason, with the winner earning a gold gong and second place a silver gong.

Meanwhile, boat races (pryne laung) are held in the creeks that meander through Mrauk U, and spectators cheer the rowers from temporary stages built along the water's edge. Also popular with the crowds is the annual Kason football tournament, which attracts more than 100 teams from all 17 townships in Rakhine State.

The festival is set against the backdrop of Mrauk U, an ancient Rakhine capital that was founded in 1430 and flourished between the 15th and 18th centuries. According to one popular legend, King Asoka from India once visited Rakhine, where he met a monkey-queen and a peacock-king who between them had produced two eggs. King Asoka prophesied that a great city would be founded on the spot named Myauk (monkey) Oo (egg). Upon hatching, the eggs produced two beautiful girls that were raised by guardian nats (animist spirits).

In his book Historical Sites in Burma (1972), archeologist Aung Thaw notes how the Rakhine established themselves as a distinct ethnic group in the 10th century and moved to a succession of capital cities in Pyinsa, Parin, Hkrit and Launggyet. In 1406 Launggyet was invaded by the Bamar kingdom of Ava, forcing the Rakhine King Minsawmun to flee to Bengal under the protection of Muslim sultans. In 1430 Sultan Jalaluddin Muhammad Shah helped restore Minsawmun to the Rakhine throne as his vassal, and later that year King Minsawmun established the new capital of Mrauk U, which persisted until 1785 when it was invaded by the Bamar King Bodawpaya.

Aung Thaw writes how the kings of Mrauk U, though Buddhists, "saw fitting to use Mohammedan names in addition to their own names and even struck medallions bearing the Mohammedan confession of faith in Persian script." In keeping with the eclectic religious atmosphere of the Mrauk U kingdom, many of the ancient pagodas, which date from the 15th and 16th centuries, display both Buddhist and Hindu iconography.

Shittaung Pagoda is one of the most important religious structures in Mrauk U. The name "Shittaung" means "80,000," in reference to the number of Buddha images said to be contained within. According to religious scholars, "Shittaung" was rounded off from 84,000, the number of Buddha relics said to have been enshrined by King Asoka in stupas throughout India.

Shittaung Pagoda was built in 1535 by one of the most powerful kings of the Mrauk U Dynasty, Minbin (also known as Minbargyi), who ruled from 1531 to 1553. According to some accounts, the construction of the temple commemorated the successful repulsion of a Portuguese attack on Mrauk U, while others say it was built to celebrate a victorious military campaign in Bengal. Whatever the case, it is also known as Ran Aung Zeya (Temple of Victory), and its connection to warfare might also explain its famously fortress-like design.

Located about half a mile north of the ancient Mrauk U palace site, Shittaung Pagoda sits on a promontory halfway up the west side of Phokhaung Taung hill. Said to have been constructed over the course of one year by 1000 architects and labourers, the pagoda features 2-metre-thick sandstone walls held in place with stone brackets rather than with mortar. Despite its defensible location, imposing design and labyrinthine layout, the structure was built not for military purposes but for prayer, initiation rituals and royal ceremonies.

The first of the two terraces is reached by a flight of steps on the south side. The main temple is surrounded by 26 smaller stupas, including Nay Htwet Para (Sunrise Pagoda) with an east-facing entrance and Nay Win Para (Sunset Pagoda) oriented westward.

Near the stairway is a small building containing the Shittaung Pillar, said to have been brought from nearby Wethali and placed at the site by King Minbin in 1535. Renovated after sustaining damage from a bombardment during World War II, the red sandstone obelisk stands 10 feet tall and measures 2 feet 4 inches on each of its four sides, three of which display inscriptions in Sanskrit language dating from the 5th or 6th century to the mid-11th century. The well-preserved western face, engraved in the 8th century, lists ancient Rakhine kings from 638 BCE to 729 CE, ending with King Anandachandra, who was a lay Buddhist but also a donor of Hindu monasteries.

A wooden prayer hall just outside the central pagoda contains hundreds of Buddha statues. From here, several entrances provide access to different areas of the maze-like interior of the main pagoda. The southwestern doorway leads to the 100-metre-long outer passageway that encircles the inner sanctum. The outer wall of the corridor features arched alcoves, each holding a pair of life-sized Buddha images sitting back-to-back, while the inner wall is lined with more than 1000 relief sculptures carved on sandstone slabs and arranged into six tiers.

The figures – which exhibit both Buddhist and Hindu influences – represent animals, guardian spirits and celestial beings, as well as human figures in native Rakhine costume engaged in activities such as wrestling, playing musical instruments and praying. Other tiers show scenes from the Jataka tales, or stories from the previous lives of the Buddha. Larger sculptures are placed at the corners of the long passageway and represent the king of the celestials and his four queens, King Minbin surrounded by ministers and queens, and others.

The narrower inner galleries are lined with hundreds of Buddha images of varying sizes, and there is also a sculpted Buddha footprint said to be a remnant of his visit to Rakhine State after achieving enlightenment. The small inner sanctum, accessible by a narrow passageway, is dominated by a gilded stone Buddha image sitting on the original ornamented stone base dating back to the 16th century.

The fortunes of Shittaung Pagoda have ebbed and flowed since it was built nearly 500 years ago. In 1891, German-born Swiss Pali scholar Emil Forchhammer wrote A Report on the History of Arakan in Three Parts in which he described the pagoda as a virtual ruin, with the small exterior stupas “undermined by treasure-hunters” and in a “dilapidated condition.” He continued, “The debris and rubbish have so accumulated on the outer platform ... that no light can penetrate ... Innumerable bats whisk through the passage, and the stench arising from unventilated Hsipaw is a popular destination for trekking thanks to its location in northern Shan State, where the soil is fertile and a variety of ethnic groups live side by side.

A Shan woman smokes a cheroot in her village home

The road to Hsipaw

Set in the rugged mountains of northern Shan State, Hsipaw is relatively far from the tourist trail but still easy to access. I caught the early train from Mandalay, travelling via the former British hill station of Pyin Oo Lwin and over the majestic Gokteik viaduct, reaching Hsipaw just as the sun was setting. Spend a few days in this town and you start to see familiar faces everywhere you go. For me, it began to feel more like a large village where everyone knows each other.

What to do in Hsipaw

Hsipaw is a cosy town and you can easily find yourself spending more days there than you had anticipated. The best way to get around is by bicycle. The main street is lined with shops and restaurants, although the true gems are naturally hidden in the side streets. A good Indian meal followed by a cup of fresh juice from Mr Shake is just what you need before or after trekking. There are also plenty of accommodation options if you haven't pre-booked. When we stepped off the train, the local drivers were racing to take us to their preferred guesthouses.

Going off the grid

Our trekking guide, Min Tau, picked us up from our guesthouse at about 9am and we headed north of Hsipaw for our three-day trekking trip. Starting earlier would have saved us from walking during the hottest part of the day, but we took plenty of breaks to sit in small shops, drinking green tea and coffee mix. Min Tau made sure to remind us to buy water every time we saw a shop because there were stretches when the villages were more than 5 kilometres apart. Being the end of April, the countryside was red and dry, and the only way to go around was on foot or motorbikes. It must be tougher to walk during the rainy season, but the scenery would be much livelier and greener.

Villages around Hsipaw are mostly ethnic Palaung and Shan. Hiring a local guide is definitely advised; most have spent years traversing the hills and villages so they know the best routes. Some speak all the local languages, which opens the door to fascinating experiences. Our guide was young but had accompanied his father when he was guiding groups of tourists and thus learned the least-travelled routes. He took us off the main road, which besides letting us walk in the shade meant we got a glimpse of locals' lives.

The harvest

In one village, a charismatic Palaung woman showed me a picture of herself at my age. Now 68, she was the head of her household, taking caring of her family and home. We were visiting in the middle of the harvest season, when she and her children were busy processing tea leaves. The younger girls arrived from their small family plantations with baskets full of freshly picked leaves and the older lady spread them evenly on a bamboo mat to dry. In Myanmar, it's rare to see a woman drink beer and smoke cigars, but at the end of the day this lady clearly enjoyed both.

Sleeping like a local

Each day we reached our destination in the afternoon, which gave us time to explore the surroundings. The villagers are by now used to foreigners; you'd need to trek for a few more days to reach somewhere truly off the beaten track. This made it all the easier though for us to play with the children and mingle with the monks at the monastery, or just observe the elders while they smoked and sorted the tea leaves. We were invited to attend a morning prayer ceremony at the monastery and were welcomed by many warm smiles.

Shan food, purely delicious

At our two homestays, in Pan Kan and Man Lwyne villages, we were served delicious home-cooked meals. I was overwhelmed by the hospitality of our hosts, who were always quick to offer more once we finished a dish. The food was all vegetarian; Shan State is the capital of fresh produce in Myanmar and we were lucky to get the chance to taste it shortly after it had been harvested.

Three days are plenty

In total we walked 45 kilometres in three days. This is not a huge distance and the terrain is not particularly difficult. Under the scorching sun, it was more tiring than we had expected. However, we preserved energy by walking at a modest pace, which also meant we could spend our time in conversation, contributing to a relaxed atmosphere. We met a group of hikers who had decided to do a trek on their own with a hand-drawn map from Mr Book, a shop in Hsipaw. The route took them on the main roads, meaning they missed the tea plantations and little settlements. Hiring a local guide not only gives you a warmer experience, it also supports employment in the area.

Why go?

The trekking routes around Hsipaw are less crowded than the famous Kalaw-Inle trip. Because it is less exposed to tourism and the locals still make their living by farming, the area feels more authentic. This may change before long, so go there now – and make sure to bring back sun-dried tea leaves as souvenirs for friends and family.

On the pilgrim trail

Thomas Kean

The late arrival of our bus was the first indication of the troubled journey ahead. At that point, though, as we waited on a Friday evening in a teashop near the junction of Upper Pansodan and Bo Min Yaung streets, we were too excited to mind. When we eventually rolled into the Shwese ttaw Pagoda Festival site – 20 hours, four teashop/ restaurants, one flat tyre, two immigration checkpoints, three pagodas, a mud volcano and a dry riverbed crossing later – we were much less sanguine about our adventure. To compound matters, we'd been forced to watch a DVD of karaoke-style Thingyan songs from an up-and-coming singer of highly questionable talent.

When invited to come on the trip I'd been told that Shwese ttaw was somewhere in Minbu township. I found Minbu on a map, noted it was close to Magwe and figured it wouldn't take too long to get there – after all, it didn't look that far from Nay Pyi Taw. It was a rookie error. As all road warriors here know, distance matters less than the quality of roads. Whether you're on a pilgrim bus is also important, as it dictates the number of stops on the way.

To top things off, on that March day it was also stinking hot at Shwese ttaw – above 40 Celsius in the shade. We were dropped with our bags in a dusty carpark, which I later realised was a dry creekbed, and left to fend for ourselves.

From here, things could only get better, and they did. Because of its remoteness, all visitors – aside from those who live locally – stay on site, either on their buses or in the modest accommodation available. We soon located a bamboo hut for rent, dropped our bags and fell asleep on the floor – all six of us, our heads resting on bags and piles of clothes.

When we eventually woke, we began exploring our surroundings. The hut opened onto Mann Creek, which during the hot season is only about 20 metres wide and waist deep. It was full of visitors of all ages escaping the heat, taking photos and playing with balls. Many were taking the opportunity to wash off the dirt acquired during their travels and patches of the water were covered with a slick of soap and shampoo. Vendors were selling pots of small fish that could be released into the water to earn merit.

As night fell, we looked through some of the shops, which included the usual festival fare, such as imported clothes and plastic toy guns, as well as local products like handwoven blankets.

Shwesettaw boasts not one, but two sacred sites – both of which purport to house heavily gilded footprints of the Gautama Buddha. This is where Shwesettaw derives its name: “shwe” means “gold”, while “settaw” means “footprint”. Auk Settaw Yar Pagoda is located beside the creek (“auk”=“lower”), while perched up on a nearby hill is Ahtat Settaw Yar Pagoda (“ahtat”=“upper”).

The footprints are said to have been made in the 12th year after the Buddha attained enlightenment, when he visited the area with a group of 500 followers in an effort to spread the dhmma (teachings). According to the historian G.E Harvey, the location of the site was lost for many years before being rediscovered by a monk named Taungbila Sayadaw in the 17th century. Today it is one of the more revered pilgrimage sites in the country.

When we took advantage of the cooler evening air to visit the lower pagoda, it was jammed full of pilgrims buying gold leaf to place on the oversized footprint, which was about a metre long.

It’s not always quite that busy, though. The Shwesettaw Pagoda festival is unique in that it runs for two or more months, from the fifth waning day of Tabodwe – February 16 this year – to Myanmar New Year’s Day, which is celebrated annually on April 17.

We had come on the full moon of Tabaung, in mid-March. On this particular year the auspicious day fell on a weekend, helping to push visitor numbers even higher; trustees estimated that 100,000 pilgrims had visited in the few days around the full moon.

Each weekend during the festival period, the site hosts tens of thousands of pilgrims from across the country. Visitor numbers drop off during the week and outside of the festival Shwese Taw is virtually deserted – it's often inaccessible during rainy season.

To get a sense of the scale, it's best to climb the long, covered staircase up to Ahtat Settaw Yar Pagoda, which offers commanding views of Mann Creek and the festival site. Below, in the curl of the dry creekbed, sat a mass of bamboo buildings – shops and huts – including our own “riverview” room.

Its relative remoteness means that during the festival Shwese Taw becomes a small town, with all the amenities that a traveller might need. It's also an important income-generator for the local economy, including vendors and those selling locally made goods.

In recent years, attention has focused on the large sums of money that have washed through the pagoda's donation boxes as a result of the festival. Allegations surrounding the management of that money by the pagoda's board of trustees have been aired regularly. After the National League for Democracy took office in Magwe Region they introduced reforms to the pagoda's administrative procedures and financial management.

Regional government minister U Nay Myo Kyaw told weekly magazine Frontier Myanmar that the pagoda's income should have been about K2 billion a year, but it had only K3.7 billion in a bank account. An investigation found funds had been misused and elections were then held on November 30, 2016, to replace the old trustees.

What effect this will have for festivalgoers was unclear at the time of writing. It may help to stem some of the price gouging that goes on at peak festival times, when bamboo rooms can cost as much as K60,000 a night. It may also help to encourage more donations, although when I visited pilgrims seemed to have no reluctance in parting with their hard-earned.

Our visit to Shwese Taw ended with the long return bus trip, which included, of course, several pagoda, restaurant and immigration stops. Mercifully, the young pop star's Thingyan DVD had disappeared, perhaps destroyed by a half-crazed passenger. As always, the return journey seemed to pass much more quickly, and we were soon back in Yangon, ready to return to work on Monday.

NGAPALI: DISCOVERING THE MAGIC

In early 2016, Ngapali was voted the eighth best beach in the world by users of the site TripAdvisor. It's long-overdue recognition for this pristine strip of sand, which has been a holiday destination since at least the socialist era but was little known outside the country because so few tourists visited.

Those who have already been to Ngapali are no doubt already acquainted with its charms. But for the uninitiated, here are five reasons why Ngapali is not just the top beach in Myanmar, but also one of the region's best-kept holiday secrets.

YOU'LL HAVE IT MOSTLY TO YOURSELF

Go during peak season – say, February or March. After eating breakfast at your hotel, stroll down to the sand and sit on a deckchair. Gaze up and down the beach. Chances are, you'll be able to count the number of people on one or two hands. Thanks to longstanding Ministry of Hotels and Tourism rules that require hotel projects to be low-rise and low density, Ngapali never really feels crowded. The closest it gets is at Christmas and Myanmar New Year, in mid-April, when there is an influx of domestic tourists.

IT'S CONVENIENT TO GET TO

Anyone who has endured the trip over the mountains from the Ayeyarwady Region capital Patheingyi to Chaungtha or Ngwe Saung knows that it's a drag. The drive to those beaches is only getting worse as a result of Yangon's grinding traffic, which means it can take a couple of hours just to exit the city. In contrast, Ngapali is just a 45-minute plane ride, followed by 10 minutes on a bus to your hotel. Sure, it's more expensive than taking the highway bus, but it's also much more practical for a weekend or extended weekend getaway.

THE SEAFOOD IS AMAZING

It's hard to overstate how good the food is, particularly considering the price. Behind the hotels, a road runs parallel to the beach. On the other side of this road are dozens of restaurants offering freshly caught seafood, including a range of fish and prawns, squid, lobster and more. The shops are all regularly inspected by local tourism authorities to ensure they maintain hygiene and quality, which means you'll rarely have a bad meal. The hotels offer more upmarket fare but are still good value considering the freshness of the product and the quality of the preparation. For a more local style feed, head to the shops on the shore between Memento Resort and the old Ngapali Beach Hotel. Green Umbrella is a favourite and is regularly full – make a booking to avoid disappointment.

IT'S FAMILY FRIENDLY

Ngapali is perfect for a family holiday. The beach is sheltered so the waves are small and there's little undertow. There are no dangerous sea creatures to worry about. Jet skis and the like are banned, so you don't have to worry about having your head taken off as you bob in the water. The hotels tend to have large grounds so there's lots of space for children to roam, and there are always plenty of staff around to help supervise.

MOST IMPORTANTLY: THE BEACH IS AMAZING

When visitors say Ngapali has white sand, they really mean it. When they say it's got swaying palm trees on the shoreline – yep, that's true, too. And the water? Perfectly clear, even just near the shore. But the most stunning view you'll encounter is in the evening, when the sun begins to drop and the sky breaks out in spectacular shades of red, orange and pink. As the darkness begins to descend, the horizon lights up with the glow of scores of fishing boats that will bring in the following morning's catch.

NGAPALI BEACH

VOTED AS THE EIGHTH BEST BEACH IN THE WORLD BY TRIPADVISOR

YANGON

Once a multicultural, cosmopolitan city under British, Yangon slowly declined during Myanmar's long self-imposed absence from the international sphere. The city's downtown area contains wondrous reminders of the colonial era but is modernising fast. New bars, restaurants and fascinating galleries are thriving in the post-military rule era. What slight charm Yangon has lost in the country's recent and sharp progress is more than made up for in the explosion of places to eat and drink.

BAGAN (Nyaung U)

Bagan is arguably the country's peak tourist destination, and for good reason – it's one of the richest archeological sites in the region and contains more than 2000 pagodas, temples and religious sites. The zone also has some of the best hotels in Myanmar, while one company offers balloon flights that provide stunning bird's eye views of the plain. Other attractions include a golf course and horse riding tours. One of the best aspects of Bagan is the ease of getting there: visitors can fly into the Nyaung U airport, catch a bus from Mandalay or Yangon, hire a car to drive or hop on one of a number of boats and cruise there from Mandalay.

INLE LAKE (Heho)

While almost as popular with visitors as Bagan, Inle Lake is a very different kind of attraction – one where tourists are obliged to kick up their heels, relax and enjoy the scenery. The lake, which is nestled into the Shan plateau, is the second largest natural water body in Myanmar and more than 1000 metres above sea level.

Best known for its floating gardens and iconic ethnic Intha boatmen, Inle Lake offers visitors boating tours of the villages out on the water, as well as the silver and goldsmiths, and weavers who live and work there. Visitors can choose to stay in hotels on the water, in the township of Nyaung Shwe or around the edges of the lake.

MANDALAY

Often and fairly described as the cultural capital of Myanmar, Mandalay is a vastly different city to either bustling Yangon or the national capital Nay Pyi Taw. For many tourists Mandalay is the stepping off point for a tour of the country's peak tourist attractions – the stupa-dotted plains of Bagan and the idyllic Inle Lake. But the city offers so many of its own attractions that it's easy enough to spend a couple of days there, although it's best to plan ahead and do sightseeing outside of the hottest hours in the afternoon because the weather can be intense.

Mandalay has many fascinating religious sites such as the Mahamuni Pagoda and Mandalay Hill, but there is also the Royal Palace and cultural attractions such as handweaving of silk and cotton, stone carving, goldworking shops and bronze casting. Further afield are the ancient capitals of Amarapura, Sagaing, Ava and Mingun. Of these, Mingun is considered unmissable, with its incredible brick pagoda and giant bronze bell sure to catch the eye of visitors.

KYAING TONG (Kengtung)

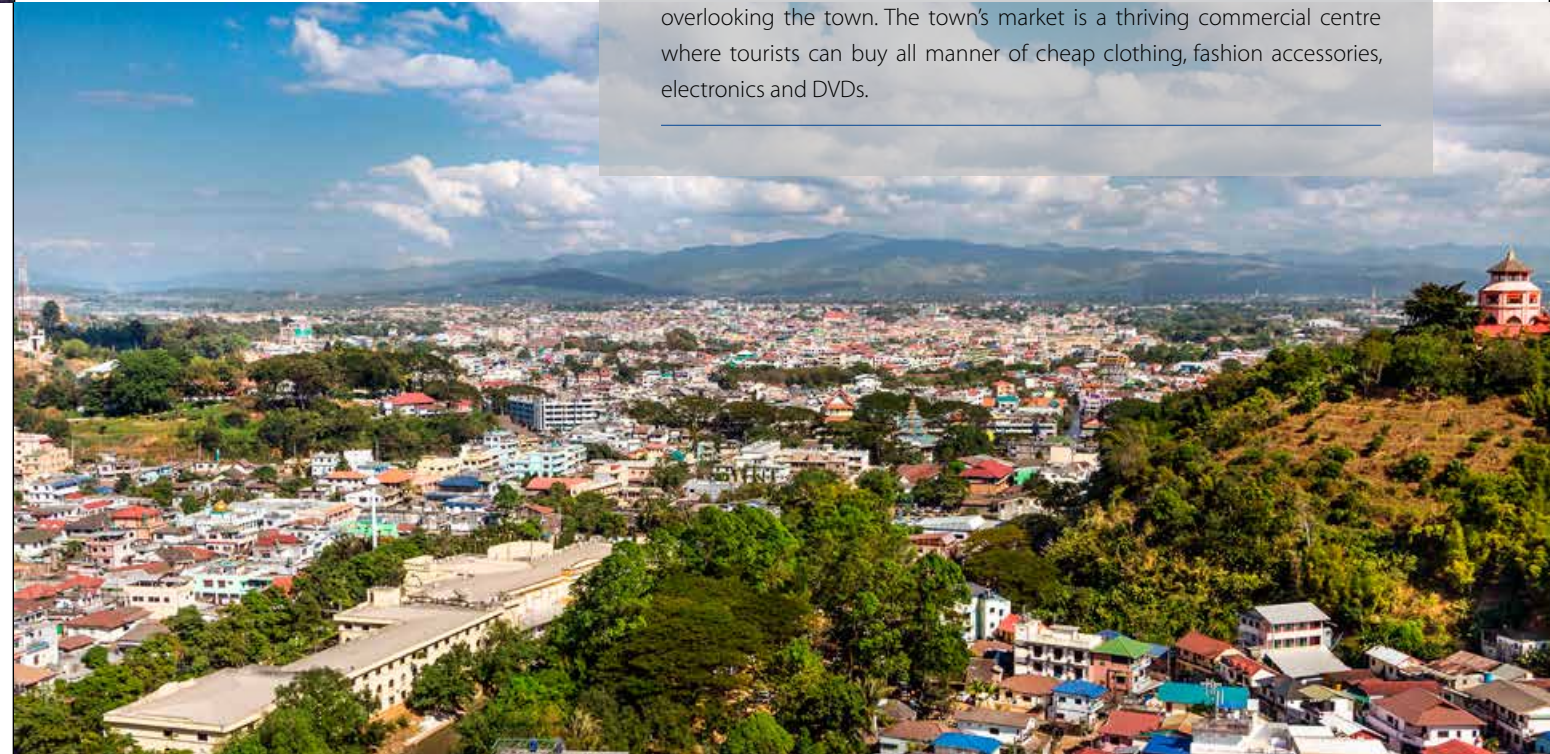

Kyaing Tong is the heart of the Golden Triangle – a hilly region where Laos, Thailand and Myanmar meet. It is a trekking oasis for travellers, both from Myanmar and abroad. The hard-to-reach hills are home to an extremely diverse mix of ethnic groups including the Akha, Lahu, Eng and Shan. Similarly diverse are the religions practiced by the different groups – it's easy to see small villages of one ethnic group in close proximity but separated by religion, be it Buddhism, Christianity or Animism. And within the town are the usual religious sites – Buddha images in different positions, churches and pagodas – that you can find in nearly every town in Myanmar. Further afield is the former casino town of Mong-La, which is notable today for its museum dedicated to the government's efforts to halt opium production.

TACHILEIK

A famous border town between Myanmar and Thailand, Tachileik is popular with tourists in Thailand who need to visit another country to get their visas renewed. A small replica of Yangon's Shwedagon Pagoda sits on a hill overlooking the town. The town's market is a thriving commercial centre where tourists can buy all manner of cheap clothing, fashion accessories, electronics and DVDs.

MYEIK

The Tanintharyi Region town of Myeik was a busy seaport during the colonial era and remains an important commerce town today. As well as hosting a large fishing fleet that trawls the Myeik Archipelago, Myeik is famous for the bird's nests harvested from shore-front buildings and the caves on its islands, as well as the pearling industry. However, there is plenty more to like about Myeik, including its incredible collection of colonial-era houses and buildings, many of which remain family homes or businesses today.

DAWEI

A formerly sleepy town in southern Tanintharyi Region, Dawei has lately become famous as the hub of a massive special economic zone and deepsea port proposed by Thailand. As well as its delicious fruits – pineapples, mangoes, mangosteens and durian – Dawei is also a major hub for other agricultural produce such as rubber, palm oil and cashew. Iconic Maungmakan Beach, where fishermen cast their nets only metres offshore is also close to the town, while the untouched wonder of the Myeik Archipelago is only a boatride away.

KAWTHAUNG

Kawthaung is Myanmar's southernmost main town and sits at the mouth of Kyan River on the Malay Peninsula with the Thai border town of Ranong to its near east. Like Tachileik, Kawthaung is popular with foreigners living in Thailand who need to exit the country to renew their visa. But Kawthaung is so much more than that – it's the most common destination to embark on one of the liveaboard boats that explore the wonders of the Myeik Archipelago, including its nearly untapped diving spots and deserted islands.

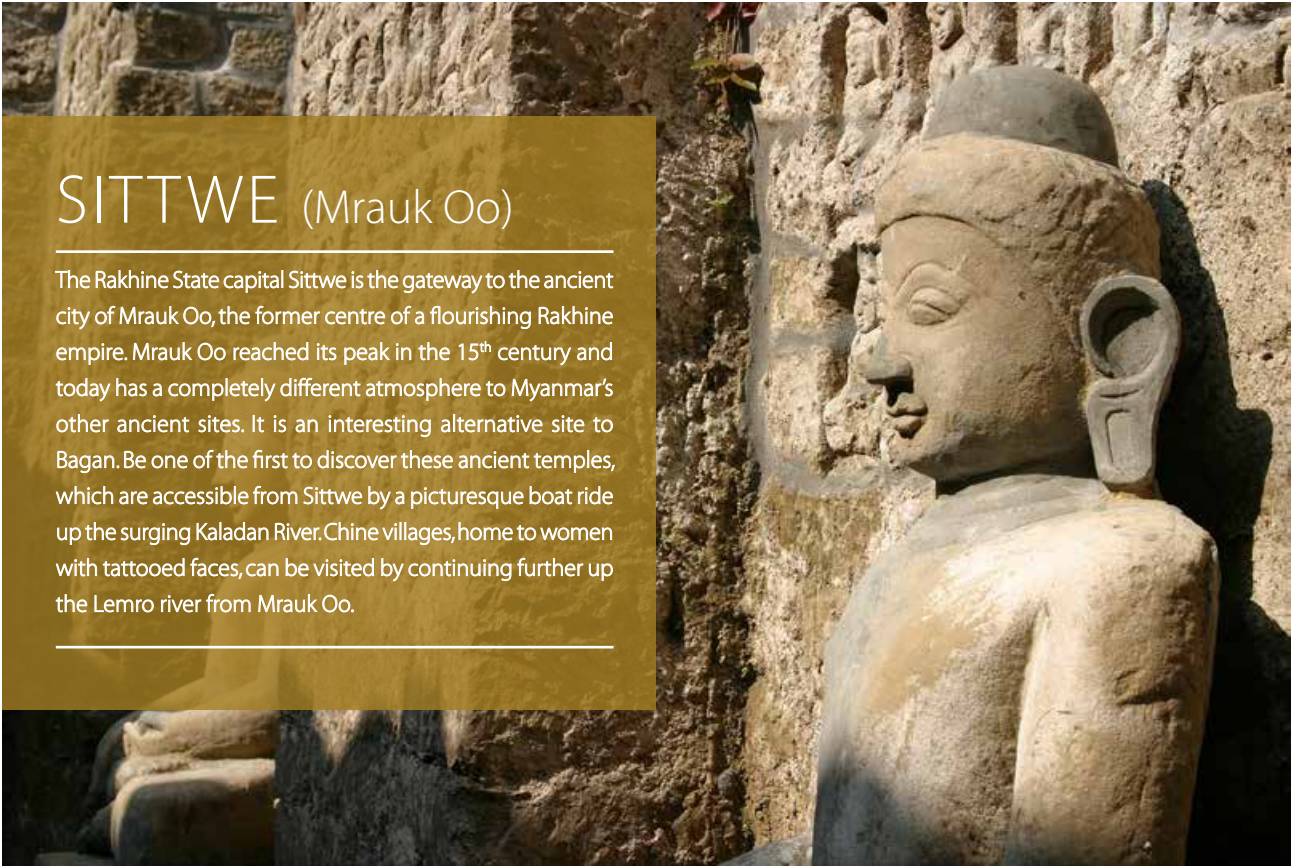

THANDWE (Ngapali Beach)

Ngapali beach, in Rakhine State's Thandwe township, offers white sand beaches, delicious seafood and perfect relaxation. While other beach getaways such as Ngwe Saung are catching up, Ngapali has an ace up its sleeve – it's less than 45 minutes by plane from Yangon, compared with five hours by car to Ngwe Saung. Most of Ngapali's hotels are located inside a wide and protected cove, making for smooth, calm and safe swimming. On the downside, once you're in Ngapali it is difficult to get around. However, small beachfront or roadside restaurants serving the area's fresh seafood and cheap cocktails have sprung up around all of the hotels, so travelling far won't be on the minds of too many visitors.

SITTWE (Mrauk Oo)

The Rakhine State capital Sittwe is the gateway to the ancient city of Mrauk Oo, the former centre of a flourishing Rakhine empire. Mrauk Oo reached its peak in the 15th century and today has a completely different atmosphere to Myanmar's other ancient sites. It is an interesting alternative site to Bagan. Be one of the first to discover these ancient temples, which are accessible from Sittwe by a picturesque boat ride up the surging Kaladan River. Chinese villages, home to women with tattooed faces, can be visited by continuing further up the Lemro river from Mrauk Oo.

KHAMTI

Located high in the upper reaches of the Chindwin River, Khamti is an emerging destination that so far sees few visitors. That could change now that travel restrictions on foreign visitors have been largely lifted (some restrictions apply outside the town). While accommodation and other amenities are still basic, the beauty of the surrounding area more than compensates, with the Naga towns of Lahe and Layshi the main attractions. Many visitors choose to fly to Khamti and then take a slow boat back down the river, passing through Homalin, Mawlaik and Kalewa.

MYITKYINA

Myitkyina is the capital of northernmost Kachin State, nearly 1500 kilometres from Yangon and even 785 to the north of Mandalay. The city is in a flat valley that is scorching hot during the summer months and sees intense rains during the monsoon. The city sits at the western bank of the mighty Ayeyarwady River, about 40 kilometres downstream from where the river begins. Myitkyina is the terminus of the railway line and a crucial trading and administrative town within Kachin State. The city is also an important location for other touristic ventures in Kachin State. It can be reached by rail, boat or air but while the railway might sound a romantic idea be warned that a one-way trip from Mandalay will take at least 24 hours.

LASHIO

Another attraction within Shan State, Lashio is the largest town in northern Shan State and a key stop on the road that links Myanmar with China. For visitors Lashio offers motorcycle treks and hiking tours into the nearby mountains.

YADANARPON AIRLINES

Enjoy Royal Service!

With Buddhist, Hindu, Muslim and Christian communities and dozens of different ethnicities, Myanmar offers travellers a rich tapestry of peoples and cultures to explore. It's possible to plan a one-day itinerary that exposes you to food and traditions with origins in China and India and Rakhine and Shan states. While many local practices feature in other societies elsewhere in South and Southeast Asia, however, there are numerous ways in which daily life here is unique and a few business practices that may surprise even the well-travelled visitor. You'll be in good shape if you plan ahead and respect and embrace Myanmar ways. Here are a few things you should keep in mind:

Always carry cash.

A combination of crisp, new American bills in addition to a good supply of Myanmar notes is a necessity. Shopkeepers will sometimes demand payment in American bills but refuse to accept ones that are dog-eared or torn. The same goes for money changers. If you're travelling outside the major centres, there may be limited or no access to ATM machines.

Try the local transport options.

In Yangon, riding in a trishaw, also known as a side car, might rightly be perceived as a dangerous proposition. But in smaller centres they're often an effective and fun mode of transport. They're also much more comfortable than they first appear. You can also try pony carts in places like Bagan and Pyin Oo Lwin, and boat rides at Inle Lake. In Yangon, consider riding the circle train. A complete three-hour loop for a foreigner costs about US$1 and gives you a slow, scenic view of various townships.

It's okay to bargain, but don't be a cheapskate.

In informal transactions, such as at a wet market or negotiating a taxi fare, it's acceptable to bargain for a lower price. The best strategy is to be friendly and consider whether the price you expect will cause your driver or shopkeeper to lose money. Keep in mind that guidebooks go out of date quickly, so a price listed in a guide from just two years ago may not represent today's fair prices.

Buses are a great way to travel, but go prepared.

While there are an increasing number of short-haul budget flights available inside Myanmar, some places are still most easily and comfortably accessible by buses. For a few extra dollars, a VIP bus will be equipped with airconditioning and extra-wide seating. The food available on board and at rest stops, however, leaves something to be desired. If you want to avoid oily or overpriced fare, stock up before you go on bottled water and snacks.

Take a taxi.

Standard practice in places like Yangon is to negotiate the fare in advance, since most cars are not equipped with meters and those with meters do not use them. If you don't know what the fare to your destination should be, inquire beforehand with a local or staff at your hotel. Short trips may be as little as K1500, while K4000 should cover a significant distance, depending on traffic and time of day. Expect to pay more after 10pm, but it's reasonable to bargain if you suspect the first-named price is too much.

Forage for your breakfast.

Many hotels will provide a complimentary breakfast. It might be convenient, but you're missing out. At street stalls, you can find local breakfast specialties such as mohinga, a fish and noodle curry, and an array of fresh fruits and juices. Tea shops, offer strong cups of milky laphet yey (literally, tea water) and various pastries such as samoosas or Chinese steamed pork buns, depending on the ethnicity of the owners.

Be in control of your sugar and monosodium glutamate (MSG) intake.

First-time visitors to Myanmar are sometimes shocked by the amount of sugar that locals consume in the form of beverages like tea with condensed milk and fruit juice. Expect that your fresh banana or watermelon smoothie will have a heaping tablespoon of sweetener in it, unless you request otherwise. The way to ask for less sugar is tha jar shob htet par. Similarly, some restaurants add MSG to their food. The way to ask for no MSG is ar cho mhote rna htet ne.

Book hotels and guest houses in advance.

This is especially wise if you're travelling in peak season. The number of expected tourists to Myanmar has gone up tremendously in the past couple of years, to 3 million in 2014. Although investors are pouring money into the tourism industry, for the moment the supply of hotel rooms is modest. You might consider booking through a travel agent, of which there are many in Yangon and Mandalay. A travel agent can help you save time and stress.

Pack a few basic essentials everywhere:

Sunscreen, insect repellent, ear plugs and a headlamp or flashlight. As in other parts of Asia, you can find sunscreen and insect spray in local shops and supermarkets but not many of the brands that you would find in Western countries. Bring your own if you want quality assurance. Earplugs are a necessity if you plan to be travelling by bus - most play hours of pop music videos or soap operas, sometimes until wee hours of the morning. A headlamp will save you trouble on days of unexpected power outages, on treks and, in small towns, the hours just before and after dark when electricity may not be available.

Off the beaten path really is remote.

Be aware that some towns and villages may not have any services geared toward tourists, except for a couple small snack shops. If you're going into areas less accustomed to tourists, plan ahead and be prepared to rough it. Hsipaw, Namshan and Putao, for example, are great places to go trekking. But if you're looking for hot showers and a choice of dinner plans, these places may not be for you.

Plan for the season.

For most activities, the best time to visit Myanmar is the cool season between November and February. But if you're visiting during the rainy season, June to September, try Upper Myanmar - the plains region of Bagan and Mandalay - which stays relatively dry. If you are visiting in the cool season, also be aware that Bagan and northern regions like Shan State will be chilly enough that you'll want to pack pants, layers and a jacket.

How you dress is how you will be judged.

Dress across Myanmar tends to the conservative side. You won't see local ladies wearing sleeveless tops, even at the beach, and only in big cities will some girls sport mini skirts or leggings. Expect some extra attention, or reluctant service in small shops, if you do. When visiting a temple or monastery, opt for long pants or the traditional longyi, covered shoulders and no cleavage. Otherwise you may be denied entry or, if you're lucky, you can loan a longyi.

A kissing sound will get a waiter's attention.

It might seem like a rude thing to do, but whether you're at a tea shop or a beer station, you'll hear locals pucker their lips and make a sound like a cat-call to order a beverage or get the bill. It's perfectly acceptable and much more effective than waving your arms.

Prohibition on use of portable electronic devices in aircraft

Almost all portable electronic devices used by aircraft crew and passengers have not been designed to the stringent standards normally applied to aircraft equipment.

By using portable electronic devices in aircraft both in flight and on the ground, the radio signals transmitted from these devices can interfere with the navigational and communication equipment that may jeopardize aircraft safety.

Therefore, as Myanmar is a Contracting State of ICAO, the Department of Civil Aviation has decided to follow the international convention and prohibit the use of portable electronic devices in public transport aircraft during the entire flight.

Portable electronic devices include, but only not limited to the following equipment.

1. Mobile telephone
2. Cellular telephone
3. Portable video equipment
4. Laptop or portable PC without printer
5. Electronic games, electronic calculators and electronic shavers
6. Cassette/CD/DVD/minidisk players (used electronic headphones only), MP3 players (used electronic headphones only).
